LAND for TOMORROW

Land for Tomorrow is a statewide coalition of community leaders, organizations and local governments with a common goal: increasing land and water conservation. The coalition works to ensure that the state's four conservation trust funds – Clean Water Management Trust Fund (CWMTF), Natural Heritage Trust Fund (NHTF), Parks and Recreation Trust Fund (PARTF) and Agricultural Development and Farmland Preservation Trust Fund (ADFPTF) – are well-funded.

The creation and consistent funding of North Carolina's conservation trust funds have been the result of bipartisan forward-thinking leadership over the past 25 years. This smart leadership has resulted in the preservation of hundreds of thousands of acres of family farms, forests, stream banks, game lands, parks, greenways and trails. Conservation has kept many areas natural, providing clean air and drinking water, flood control and recreational opportunities for North Carolina families. These land protection successes have also played a major role in the state's economy, boosting agriculture, the military, tourism, forestry, hunting, fishing and wildlife-watching.

It is important to note that the state trust funds are rarely the sole source of funding for any project. The trust funds are used to leverage other private, local and federal funds. For example, since its creation the Clean Water Management Trust Fund has invested $251,598,236 in 288 wastewater projects across the state, using those funds to leverage an additional $460,441,096.

Land for Tomorrow publishes this annual report to provide an update on the state of public conservation funding and land protection successes in North Carolina.

LAND AND WATER CONSERVATION IS GOOD BUSINESS

Land and water conservation and North Carolina's economy are closely connected. Conservation is invaluable to the state's largest economic drivers – agriculture, the military, travel/tourism and outdoor recreation. That's why supporting the state's conservation trust funds is good business.

ALL OF THESE INDUSTRIES ARE DEPENDENT ON LAND AND WATER CONSERVATION

Agriculture – $71.6 Billion

Military – $23.4 Billion

Travel and Tourism – $18.4 Billion

Outdoor Recreation – $7.5 Billion

Hunting and Fishing – $4.3 Billion

Another easy connection can be made to the $7.5 billion outdoor recreation industry, which includes hunting and fishing. The state's Clean Water Management Trust Fund has helped to add more than 170,000 acres to Wildlife Resource Commission game lands. Additional trust fund dollars have helped to preserve mountain streams, ensuring that trout fishermen have a place to cast a line.

Agriculture, including forestry, remains North Carolina's No. 1 industry, contributing $71.6 billion a year – 20 percent of North Carolina's total income. Clean air, clean water and the continued availability of agricultural land are vital to agriculture. It can be argued that virtually every dollar spent on conservation benefits agriculture in some way.

Land and water conservation have also been crucial to protecting North Carolina's military bases against Base Realignment and Closure, ensuring that they stay open and continue to pump $23.4 billion a year into the economy. The state's conservation trust funds have leveraged Department of Defense funding to preserve 16 miles of base boundary at Fort Bragg and 50,000 acres around Camp Lejeune. Preventing incompatible uses around those bases helps to ensure that they remain a vital part of the state's economy.

What would you say if someone came to you and said they could guarantee a 300 percent return on an investment? You'd probably be surprised, but conservation funding does. A 2011 study by the Trust for Public Land found that for every dollar the state invests in land and water infrastructure, it sees a yield of $4 in natural goods and services such as clean water, clean air and flood control.

For all these reasons, conservation is good for the economy. As North Carolina continues to recover from the recent economic downturn, it is crucial that we continue to invest in land and water conservation.

This report tells the story of successful land and water conservation projects that have had a positive impact on North Carolina's economy and North Carolinians. Please help us continue to strengthen North Carolina by supporting the state's land and water conservation trust funds. They are a small, but very important, part of North Carolina's budget.

NORTH CAROLINA'S CONSERVATION TRUST FUNDS

North Carolina has four publicly funded conservation trust funds.

The Clean Water Management Trust Fund (CWMTF), created in 1996, is a primary source of grants for hundreds of local governments, state agencies and conservation nonprofits to address water pollution, protect clean water supplies and upgrade water treatment capabilities. Funded projects have significantly improved those communities' ability to attract business investment.

The Natural Heritage Trust Fund (NHTF), created in 1987, is funded by a portion of the state deed stamp tax and income from personalized license plates. It provides funding for the acquisition and protection of land that is home to rare plant and animal species as well as important wildlife habitats. It also covers the acquisition of sites significant to North Carolina's cultural history.

The Parks and Recreation Trust Fund (PARTF), created in 1994, is funded by a portion of the state deed stamp tax and a small portion of the personalized license plate revenues. It supports improvements in the state's park system, provides dollar-for-dollar matching grants to local governments for parks and assists improvements to public beach and estuarine access, which are important to local tourism economies. PARTF is the main source of funding for most state park improvements or land acquisition to create new parks and expand existing ones.

The Agricultural Development and Farmland Preservation Trust Fund (ADFPTF), created in 1986, supports public and private enterprise programs that promote sustainable agricultural, horticultural and forestland activities.

LEFT: Hunting and fishing have traditionally played a huge role in North Carolina. The love for that kind of outdoor activity is often passed from generation to generation as evidenced by this picture of North Carolina Wildlife Federation CEO Tim Gestwicki's daughter Rose with her catch. It also funds conservation easements on farms, forests and horticultural lands for production of food, fiber and other agricultural products.

THE HUNTING AND FISHING CONNECTION

With well over 1 million licensed hunters and anglers, sportsmen form the largest self-identified special interest group in the state. Sportsmen contribute directly to the state economy with license fees and fuel the economy via gear, ammo and tackle purchases as well as in gas, food, travel and lodging. In fact, according to the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, sportsmen contribute $3.3 billion annually to North Carolina's economy, proving they are an economic engine for the state.

"North Carolina is blessed with about 2 million acres of public game lands open to the public for all kinds of recreational pursuits. The conservation trust funds were the sources of wise investment in acquiring public lands over the past 20 years," explains Dick Hamilton, who leads the Camo Coalition, a group of hunters and anglers devoted to preserving their traditions.

Since its creation in 1996, the Clean Water Management Trust fund has helped to protect more than 170,000 acres of new game lands.

North Carolina Wildlife Federation CEO Tim Gestwicki says this investment is particularly important as the state changes. "As North Carolina continues to grow it is imperative that the state proactively works for game lands and watershed protections," he explains. "All research points to a rapid continuation of North Carolina population growth with estimates that by 2030 the population will increase by the same amount as if the entire state of South Carolina was picked up and transplanted to North Carolina. If we are going to continue to recruit and retain business in the face of this growth, preserving recreational areas is a key priority."

Trout, in particular, need clean water. A 2009 study by Responsive Management and Southwick Associates found that mountain trout fishing accounts for more than 92,000 anglers a year, with a total economic value of $146 million to our state.

Game lands also are a wonderful resource for birders, hikers and paddlers. Their presence helps to provide clean drinking water and plays a valuable role in flood control.

CONSERVATION IS A BUSINESS INCENTIVE

A recent poll by Carolina Living Magazine found that the top three reasons for new residents moving to North Carolina are scenic beauty, climate and recreation.

Businesses are drawn to the state for the very same reasons. When Coloradan craft brewer Dale Katechis decided to expand his operations to the East Coast, he chose Brevard as the home of the new Oskar Blues brewery. “Brevard is unique. It doesn’t have a big budget to offer incentives and attract business,” he explains. “You don’t need that if you want to attract the right type of business. Protecting the natural surroundings is an incentive. It is an asset to be promoted to attract like-minded businesses”

Katechis is an avid mountain biker who has traveled to Transylvania County for two decades to ride in Pisgah Forest and Dupont State Forest. “Brevard was the only place we shopped when we decided to move east,” he said. “The thing that had been keeping me from considering an east coast brewery was that I wasn’t willing to sacrifice the quality of life I had in Colorado. But I found that in Brevard.”

Those natural surroundings, including high-quality water, have attracted three national breweries to western North Carolina in the past 18 months. In addition to Oskar Blues, Sierra Nevada and New Belgium are opening breweries in the area and adding several hundred new jobs.

Sierra Nevada CEO Brian Grossman explained his decision to expand from Chico, Calif. on his blog: “Our journey to select the second brewery location was exhaustive. For two years we explored more than 200 sites. Since we’re a brewery, water quality and supply were two of many important factors. But to be truly consistent as a company, we focused on things like quality of life and outdoor recreation – what first drew my dad to Chico.”

Katechis is not the only mountain biker visiting Dupont State Forest, considered to be one of the top mountain bike destinations on the East Coast. On weekends, it is packed with mountain bikers, climbers and hikers. The forest was preserved through a $20.8 million investment from the Clean Water Management and Natural Heritage trust funds. It is also an incredibly beautiful place, boasting a number of gorgeous waterfalls. When the producers of the 2012 hit movie “The Hunger Games” went looking for a beautiful spot to film, they chose Dupont. It wasn’t the first time Dupont had been part of a major motion picture. Dupont and nearby Chimney Rock were featured 21 years ago in “The Last of the Mohicans.” That kind of exposure drives tourism. Even today, park rangers at Chimney Rock State Park report tourists who say they have come to see where the “Last of the Mohicans” was filmed.

Tammy Hopkins knows all about the buzz that a major motion picture can bring. Hopkins, CEO of the Transylvania Arts Council, serves as the county’s liaison to the film industry. In that role, she has conducted more than 150 media tours of Dupont Forest since 2011. Interest began before the filming and continues to grow, with journalists from across the United States, Mexico, Canada and Europe eager to visit the site.

In addition to her work with the Council, she and a friend run a business providing “Hunger Games” tours to Dupont. “The tourism here is rocking,” she says. “The tours sold out, and we had to add an additional tour in the winter. I just had 13 writers from Germany, the UK and Amsterdam here. They are going to write stories, and people will visit here as a result.”

RECORD STATE PARK VISITATION AGAIN

North Carolina’s state parks reported record attendance in 2012, with 14.2 million visits. In the past 25 years, North Carolina’s state parks have seen an 87 percent increase in visitation. In 1987, just 7.6 million people visited state parks.

Fort Macon State Park in Carteret County had the highest number of visits in 2012 at 1.24 million. One of Fort Macon’s major attractions is its state-of-the-art Coastal Environmental Education Center. The Center opened in 2009 and was funded with a $1 million grant from the Parks and Recreation Trust Fund.

Other state parks have had similar projects that were funded by the Parks and Recreation Trust Fund and have also shown increased visitation as a result of those improvements. Gorges State Park in Transylvania County opened a new 7,100-square-foot visitor center and experienced a 22 percent increase in 2012 visitation. Chimney Rock State Park in Rutherford County improved access and recorded a 36 percent increase in attendance. William B. Umstead State Park in Wake County improved parking and trails, and visitation jumped by 33 percent.

State Parks Director Lewis Ledford says parks are filling a need for affordable recreation and contributing to the local economy. "Continued record attendance demonstrates that our state parks and state recreation areas fulfill a desire of North Carolinians and their visitors for affordable family recreation and a meaningful outdoor experience. A direct result of this high visitation is the strong contributions that state parks make to North Carolina's tourism economy as well as the economies of local communities," he says.

A 2008 economic study by North Carolina State University researchers showed that state park visitors spent an average of $23.56 per day. That study also estimated that the state parks' annual economic impact was $400 million and the creation of nearly 5,000 jobs. That number is likely even higher today, because it predated record park attendance.

IMPROVED LOCAL PARK FACILITIES BOOST THE ECONOMY

The Parks and Recreation Trust Fund also funds improvements to local parks. The City of Eden in Rockingham County used PARTF money to create Freedom Park. Eden Director of Parks and Recreation Johnny Farmer says the money came to Eden during a particularly tough time.

"When we got the first phase of funding, the economy was really bad. There were lots of plants closing. Things were looking down," he says. "But, that grant allowed us to create a central park. It gave us a gathering place in our community."

The town developed a playground, softball field and nature trails at the facility. "Now we have a regional facility in the middle of Eden," he says. "It has turned into the premier parks and recreation facility in all of Rockingham County. Residents use it on a daily basis. And, it is an economic tool for us because we are able to have tournaments there from March to November."

With the new facility, the town has had the honor of hosting four weeklong Dixie Youth Baseball Tournaments since 2005.

"They spend money here. They stay at motels. They buy food. They buy gas. It is a recreational tool but is also an economic tool," explains Farmer. "It has a tremendous impact on the local economy. We are filling up all the motel rooms and restaurants in Rockingham County."

Farmer estimates that each of those tournaments has pumped a half million dollars into the economy. That's a $2 million return on a $400,000 investment from the Parks and Recreation Trust Fund from the tournaments alone. "The park brought our community together when we were having tough economic times, and now it is beneficial to the local economy," Farmer concludes.

PRESERVING A WATERSHED & PROVIDING RECREATIONAL OPPORTUNITIES

In Cherokee County, the Town of Murphy has used the Clean Water Management Trust Fund to protect Fain Mountain Watershed. When Murphy Mayor Bill Hughes first thought of the concept, he says, he was reluctant to approach his fellow council members. But, when he broached the idea, the council was unanimous – sell a conservation easement to the state, protect the area and put the funds in trust to cover infrastructure needs.

"It was a leap of faith, but it has worked out. The property will remain in its natural state for future generations to enjoy," he says. "We put the property in trust. And, small towns can always use extra money. We still have quite a bit of flexibility with the use of the land. We can develop nature trails and even build a classroom there. But, it can't be chopped into lots and sold."

Hughes, who has been on the town council for more than 23 years and has served as mayor for 16 years, says he isn't anti-development. "I'm not against progress, but even with the money that development brings, there is still a price to pay for that development. My advice is if you have a watershed, put it in trust so it will be maintained. Property of that sort is going to be very difficult to find in the future. It is an investment in the future."

RESTORING AN URBAN WATERWAY

The Clean Water Management Trust Fund doesn't just support protection of pristine areas along streams. It has also funded significant urban stream restoration. Charlotte's Little Sugar Creek is a prime example. Its problems go back to the early part of the last century. A photo dating from the 1920s shows a bucket hanging over the creek. That bucket contained orange-scented water – it was hoped that the perfume would override the creek's stink. In the 1960s, it was listed as one of the country's most contaminated streams. Much of the creek was concreted over when Charlottetown Shopping Center was built.

Since 1999, the Clean Water Management Trust Fund has funded more than $6 million to restore the creek – removing the concrete, restoring its natural flow to improve flood control and stabilizing its banks.

Today, the once-stinking creek is attracting birds, fish and people. The people come to walk on a greenway, which was developed by the Mecklenburg County Parks and Recreation Department. Planner Gwen Cook heads up the project. "The whole project, stream restoration and greenway, complement each other," she said. "We're showing an urban population what is necessary for good water quality – developing a stream enhancement that is right in the face of the urban public. That sends a message. Wildlife came in just as soon as we restored the riparian buffer. I've seen finches and blue herons and there are more fishes, so aquatic life is recovering as well."

Cook says a conservative estimate, based on surveys along the greenway, puts 500,000 visits a year to the greenway – a number that is likely to grow as the project matures. The Little Sugar Creek Greenway is part of the Carolina Thread Trail, which stretches across 15 counties in North and South Carolina. The state's conservation trust funds have paid for work all along the trail. The trail will provide residents with a great recreational opportunity while also protecting downstream water supplies and providing flood control.

Executive Director of the Foundation for the Carolinas Michael Marsicano says the Thread Trail is beneficial to everyone involved. "The Thread Trail is one of the first multi-county efforts that has brought together local governments, corporations, and the nonprofit community to partner on a scale as significant as this," he says. "It's an extraordinary undertaking that will benefit over two million people, free of charge."

CLEANING UP WASTEWATER AND STORMWATER

Since its creation, the Clean Water Management Trust Fund has funded 434 stormwater and wastewater projects, granting $307.8 million, which leveraged an additional $536.9 million. Major cities including Charlotte, Raleigh, Greensboro, Winston-Salem, Fayetteville, Wilmington and Asheville have received grants. So have hundreds of smaller cities and communities.

Stormwater can be a big problem. Improperly controlled, it can lead to flooding. Improperly treated, it can lead to in-stream water-quality problems. Both were problems at UNC-Asheville. The campus experienced a growth spurt during the last decade – adding students and new buildings. Stormwater from the campus was shooting pollutants into the French Broad River. It also led to flooding in the Town of Woodfin. The Clean Water Management Trust Fund supported several stormwater upgrades on the campus.

"Without the Clean Water Management Trust Fund, we would not have been able to do this work," says Melissa Acker, Director of Landscaping for UNCA. "This is also important because we are a university and because we have students that are learning all about the environmental impact of stormwater. This transforms what we normally do in the classroom, so they can learn on the campus. It helps us meet our clean water goals and our education goals." A similar project was funded at North Carolina State University.

Improving wastewater treatment systems can also play a significant role in hazard reduction. That's certainly the case in Elizabeth City. The city's wastewater once flowed to one central location, which sat right beside the Pasquotank River. In 2006, the force main ruptured, spilling 6 million gallons of raw sewage into the river. Thanks to a $2 million Clean Water grant, the city built a new line that diverts untreated wastewater from the flood plain. "During hurricanes, that lift station would become inundated with Pasquotank floodwater," says Town Manager Rich Olson. "Now, there is no chance of that recurring."

The fund has covered major wastewater improvements, but it has also covered projects that were crucial to some of the state's smallest towns. One of these is a 2007 $1.9 million grant that helped Cove City (population 412) in Craven County. According to the Craven County Health Department, most of the town's wastewater treatment systems had failed, and untreated wastewater was flowing into nearby streams. For some people in the community, the only bathroom was an outhouse. The grant, which leveraged other funds from the NC Rural Center and local taxpayers, was used to construct four miles of gravity sewers and pump stations. Cove City Mayor Dred C. Mitchell called the new central sewer system “a blessing to our community.”

Clarkton Town Administrator Keith Croom has similar praise for the fund. His town received a $500,000 grant to help replace a 60-year-old system and bring customers into the system who had been relying on failing septic tanks for wastewater treatment. “Thank you to the Clean Water Management Trust Fund,” Croom says. “Five hundred thousand may seem insignificant to some, but for a town of the size of Clarkton, it is a tremendous amount.”

PRESERVING THE FAMILY FARM

Agriculture is North Carolina’s top industry. It is an industry that is heavily dependent on clean water and clean air. It is also dependent on land availability. But, North Carolina is losing farmland at an alarming rate. According to the USDA’s agricultural census, North Carolina is a leader in the rate of lost farmland – losing 1,000 farms and 600,000 acres of farmland from 2002 to 2007. The 2012 federal agricultural census is not yet available, but according to the North Carolina Department of Agriculture, the state lost an additional 1,500 farms and 100,000 acres of farmland from 2007 to 2011.

Agriculture Commissioner Steve Troxler is worried about what those losses mean for our food supply. “The economic strength of agriculture is dependent on the natural resources provided by farms and forests,” says Troxler. “Yet, from 1970 to 2010, North Carolina lost 6.6 million acres of farmland. That’s a lot of land no longer producing food and fiber. With worldwide food demand rising, we need to make sure we have the ability to produce an abundant food supply. Land and water are the foundation for that production.”

The state’s Agricultural Development and Farmland Preservation Trust Fund is designed to stem that loss – to make it possible for farmers to continue to work their land and to help develop markets for their crops.

The Jackson Farm in Sampson County will remain a farm, thanks to a conservation easement funded by the Agricultural Development and Farmland Preservation Trust Fund.

Tom Jackson is one of those farmers. Jacksons have farmed his land in Sampson County for five generations. Tom moved away for a while for college and career. But he couldn’t stay away for long. In 1980, he returned to the farm and farming.

He specializes in onions and herbs and runs a produce route in the Triangle. But, in 2009, Jackson realized that the economic equation wasn’t working. The farm, which once covered more than a thousand acres, had already shrunk to 150 acres. He had a number of offers to sell the property to developers. “I didn’t want to do that. That wasn’t the kind of neighborhood I wanted to live in,” he says. “We were searching for some way to beg, borrow or steal – to get out of a financial jam.”

Enter the agricultural trust fund. Working with the Coastal Land Trust, Jackson put 100 acres of his farm into a conservation easement. “They paid me to do what I already wanted to do – to keep this farm a farm,” Jackson explains. “When you live in the absolute geographic center of the universe, how could you not enjoy it? It is a lovely place to live. I’ve lived in cities and towns. There is nothing like living in your own home on your own land and eating food that you grew from seed.”

Billy Guthrie’s watermelon farm on Bogue Sound in Carteret County will also continue to function as a farm thanks to the agricultural trust fund. The Guthrie story is representative of most of the conservation success stories told in this book’s back pages, which give county-by-county details about every trust fund expenditure since 1988. It involves a partnership of many entities and individuals working together to leverage trust fund dollars.

The 50-acre conservation easement, which was also a Coastal Land Trust project, was funded with grants from the Agricultural Development and Farmland Preservation Trust Fund, U.S. Marine Corps, Progress Energy Foundation, WalMart, Golden LEAF Foundation and North Carolina’s Environmental Enhancement Grant Program. Agricultural Commissioner Troxler spoke at a dedication ceremony for the easement.

Sadly, Billy Guthrie, a former president of the North Carolina Tobacco Growers Association, died before the dedication ceremony. Guthrie, whose family has worked the farm for more than a century, was also president of the Bogue Sound Watermelon Growers Association, a co-op that he helped found. As long as there have been Guthries on the farm, Bogue Sound has been known for its sweet watermelons. Thanks to the agriculture trust fund, those delicious watermelons will keep rolling out of Carteret County and into the produce sections of grocery stores in North Carolina and across the country.

THE MILITARY AND CONSERVATION – A VALUED PARTNERSHIP

In addition to keeping a family farm running, the easement on the Guthrie farm also provides a benefit to Marine Corps Air Station Cherry Point. Its outlying landing field at Bogue is the location for Cherry Point's fleet carrier landing practices. It is one of many projects that the U.S. Department of Defense has funded around the state's military bases.

North Carolina pioneered this approach to conservation at Fort Bragg. To date, 16 miles of Fort Bragg's boundary have been protected – ensuring that it can continue its vital training operations. "Efforts to buffer and connect Army and state lands are a perfect example of how the United States Army and the State of North Carolina, through its trust funds, have worked together for common goals," Fort Bragg Garrison Commander Col. Jeffrey M. Sanborn wrote recently to Gov. Pat McCrory.

The Army has put more than $19 million on the ground for conservation around Fort Bragg to leverage state trust fund dollars. North Carolina has been the beneficiary of similar conservation activities at Camp Lejeune and, most recently, at the Air Force's Dare County Bombing Range. Camp Lejeune's commanding officer, Brig. Gen. Thomas A. Gorry, wrote Gov. McCrory to register his support. "For several years the military has worked collaboratively with the State of North Carolina to promote conservation and compatible land use in the vicinity of military installations and other areas in which we train," he said. "These partnering projects rely heavily on state conservation funding as a match and/or leverage to the funds provided by the military and other sources."

North Carolina has remained a leader in conservation funding around military bases, largely because it has had the state trust funds to leverage the military dollars. Without those matching dollars, it is likely that the military money will go to other states. Col. Sanborn says that protecting the state trust funds is crucial for everyone involved. "As our military installations continue to grow, bringing more good jobs to North Carolina, the development pressures around Fort Bragg and Camp Mackall will only intensify," he says. "Our collective partnership will help mitigate these effects, and will help ensure that Fort Bragg's training mission and North Carolina's naturally and culturally significant areas are protected for years to come."

CONSERVATION NEEDS ARE STILL UNMET

Given the military's commitment to conservation, it is important to note that after the most recent Clean Water Management Trust Fund grant awards, several military projects needing state match were left on the table. Funding these critical projects is vital to protecting the state's military economy. A number of other worthy projects did not receive awards during the last grant cycle. The fund received applications for 157 projects. Only 24 were funded.

There are numerous worthy conservation projects – including parts of the Carolina Thread Trail and the Headwaters tract in Transylvania County, which would be managed as a state forest – still in need of funding to become reality. That project, like the others across the state, is important to our future. "The significance of the Headwaters tract is just what the name says – it's along the headwaters for a major source of water for our state," says Agriculture Commissioner Troxler. "It's important not just for water quantity but for water quality." What's true for Headwaters is true for most conservation projects. None of them are stand-alone projects. They serve multiple functions – protecting drinking water, providing flood control and offering recreational opportunities.

There are also a host of other projects from wastewater treatment projects to stream restoration to new park facilities that are in need of funding. Providing strong, consistent funding for the Clean Water Management Trust Fund and the Agricultural Development and Farmland Preservation Trust Fund is crucial for North Carolina's economic well-being.

It has been more than 2,000 years since the Roman poet/philosopher Titus Maccius Plautus said, "You must spend money to make money." That business adage still holds true. You do have to invest to get a return on that investment. North Carolina conservation funding, even at its height several years ago, has never comprised more than one half of one percent of the state's budget. But, it has made a huge difference in the state's economy, health, and quality of life. And, it will continue to do so in the future, with your support.

The following is a county-by-county listing of every conservation trust fund project since 1988.
